Thank you for the many thoughtful comments about the Sequences and Series course.

There are a couple of comments that appeared on many responses, so let me reply to them.

First of all, the tutorials: There is always a balancing act between spending more time in the tutorials in going through the exercise sheets or in answering individual students' questions.

On the whole I think the balance is about right. However, you will certainly gain more out of them if you honestly work hard at the exercise sheets before the tutorial. It is very easy to let this slide, but working ahead is something you have to learn—and is a skill that will become more and more important as your career progresses. But, in answer to a couple of questions, it is not possible to make the exercise sheets compulsory! Nor, I am afraid, is it possible to break them down into smaller groups.

Secondly, I know I sometimes make mistakes on the white-boards, for which I apologise!

This is also why I emphasised at the beginning of term that you should ask questions in class, and in particular about whether something I have written is wrong!
